Tyrosine kinase inhibitors (TKIs) are standard treatment options in patients with metastatic renal cell carcinoma (RCC). However, this therapy is not curative and there is a need for better anti-tumor drugs. Using cDNA microarrays and quantitative reverse transcription-PCR, we examined the expression of approximately 5,600 genes in seven pairs of human RCC and tumor-adjacent normal renal tissue obtained from patients treated with sunitinib. Paired t tests were used for statistical analyses, and gene sets with significant changes ($P < 0.05$) were further analyzed. There were 17 TKIs that showed significant differences in gene expression. Many of these genes are involved in the cell cycle and growth, such as E2F transcription factor 2 and murine double-minute 2 (p19^{INK4d}), whereas
