Ohio's opioid epidemic has already claimed more than 400 lives, and the state's death toll is continuing to rise, but researchers are trying to find a cure in Ohio. A 2018 study from Cleveland Clinic and University of Cincinnati found that 90 percent of people with a serious opioid use disorder (SOUD) felt positive about their life, and only a small percentage ever sought treatment. "That has to be discouraging," said Dr. Elizabeth Garcia, director of the Addiction Medicine Institute at the University of Cincinnati. "On the one hand, they don't want to go out and get inpatient rehab because they feel it's going to change the way they think about their life," said Garcia. "On the other hand, they say, 'I want to feel better about my life.'" Scientists at the Cleveland Clinic and University of Cincinnati are working to find a cure for addiction. Dr. Adam Brandt, a psychiatry professor at Cleveland Clinic, started Ohio's first research study to look at why some people with opioid use disorder find help, while others continue to use drugs. "We have these data that people want to get better, and they want to feel good about themselves," said Brandt. "The trick is to look for something that will help you." For patients who are not physically addicted to opioids, a study to better understand their needs could help people with a SOUD learn how to reduce or quit their drug use. But as the opioid epidemic continues to evolve, more patients are suffering from a serious opioid use disorder, called opioid use disorder or opioid use disorder without illicit drug use, according to Garcia. "It's happening in other countries," Garcia said. "It's happening in smaller rural communities. This is not just confined to urban areas." While the opioid crisis has sparked a flood of research and funding, Garcia said there's still a lot of work to be done in Ohio. "Ohio is just one of the states," Garcia said. " 2d92ce491b
