The data layer returns some data based on some parameters passed from the service layer. The controller passes the returned data to the view. I have written unit tests for the data layer to verify the data is correct, but what about the controller and service layer? How should I test the service layer? Should I mock the data layer? Should I mock the service layer? Should I verify the parameters in the controller are correct? My impression is that I have to mock the service layer, but that it could be too easy and make me trust my code too much. I would like to know if this is the case and how I should go about verifying these layers. A: Mocking is a very effective technique when you want to verify the behavior of a library or a class. It's also a powerful technique for isolating the behavior that you want to verify without having to write too much code. But, it's not effective when you're verifying that your code calls out to a database, logs errors, etc. Most of the time, your service layer is not something you want to test. It's not your code's responsibility to call the service layer. Instead, it's the responsibility of your controller to call the service layer. What you should be trying to test is your controller's actual behavior. Try the following: Verify that the data is being passed from the service layer to the controller Verify that the controller is calling the service layer Verify that the service layer is passing the data to the data layer Verify that the data layer is returning the data to the service layer Verify that the data is getting passed to the view. A: What you should do is to test the data layer with appropriate data
