This problem is very interesting, although it looks to be a case of a species of lateral support on the part of the Constitution itself. If you are commenting about an accessible article you must include accessibility information. Jean-Jacques Rousseau, The Social Contract, in The Collected Writings of Rousseau, 4:374-375, aube-in-preaching, coll. If you know a copy of the book that is the subject of the content you are commenting on, you can add a link to it under your comment. For example, if you are discussing an accessible version of the Constitution, you could say: Here is an accessible version of the US Constitution. Cancer is one of the most challenging diseases in the developed world, and is becoming an even greater burden in developing countries where rapid population growth and improved living conditions provide more cases of cancer and greater mortality. Cancer affects all populations, is the second leading cause of death worldwide, and the top cause of death in North America and Europe. There are two major types of cancer: carcinomas and sarcomas. Carcinomas are epithelial cancers, and are divided into four main types: (1) Colon (2) Lung (3) Breast (4) Prostate Sarcomas include cancers that have mesenchymal components, such as myoepithelial carcinoma of the breast, rhabdomyosarcoma of the soft tissues, malignant fibrous histiocytoma and clear cell sarcoma of the kidney. In addition to these, many soft tissue cancers are classified as malignant fibrous histiocytomas, fibrosarcomas and leiomyosarcomas. Many therapeutic approaches are available, but unfortunately chemotherapy has not improved long-term survival for the majority of cancer patients. A better understanding of the molecular biology of cancer has revealed many potential targets for the treatment of cancers. But, as of the present time, there are no reliable and effective targets for many types of cancers, particularly pancreatic, ovarian, breast, colorectal, non-small cell lung, and prostate cancers. Cancers can be classified into three broad categories: (1) solid tumors, which form solid masses composed of hundreds of thousands of individual cells; (2) hematopoietic tumors, which can be further divided into lymphomas and le
