Supreme Court Gives Gay Couple License to Marry The U.S. Supreme Court on Monday tossed out the conviction of an Idaho man who used his restaurant's parking lot to make love to his partner, the latest move by the court to prevent state interference with same-sex couples. The decision handed down by a majority of the nine justices was an easy one. The court found the state was the real party in interest in the case of Robert McGee, who got married in Washington, D.C., and then took advantage of Idaho's marriage license laws. He is now a Pennsylvania resident. "The threshold issue here is whether an Idaho regulation that requires a marriage license applicant to reside in Idaho or intend to reside in Idaho for one year before receiving a license violates the Equal Protection Clause. We conclude it does not," Justice Anthony M. Kennedy wrote for the court. Writing for the court's majority, Kennedy said the license requirement does not discriminate against same-sex couples, who could obtain marriage licenses in Idaho. "The Equal Protection Clause does not deny States the power to treat same-sex couples differently," he said. "To put the point differently, the Clause does not require States to choose between treating gay and lesbian couples as a class of First-Class and Second-Class citizens." The decision is a loss for the state of Idaho, which has spent millions of dollars to defend itself in lawsuits brought by the American Civil Liberties Union of Idaho, which represented the gay couple. State officials are preparing to appeal to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit, which ruled in 2006 that Idaho's ban on same-sex marriage violated the Constitution. That decision was later vacated by an appeals court panel and is the focus of a separate case pending before the court. McGee's lawyers did not immediately comment. "The effect of this decision will be to take away the lives of thousands of Idahoans. My clients are now free to get married in the privacy and dignity of their own home in the state where they reside," said ACLU Executive Director Anthony D. Romero. "It is time for Idaho to become a state that respects the civil rights of all its residents, not just those it likes." The ruling was the court's fifth one since the year 2000 striking

There's so much more to a headstone than a plain, black, nameplate with no embellishments. It's a memorial of an important person in your life who was loved and missed. It's a kind of the last goodbye for someone you loved. But it 2d92ce491b
