Saturday, August 12, 2016 Antarctica: The Final Frontier - The Green Mountains of Antarctica It was January 1979 and I had just finished my four-month field season on King George Island in the Antarctic, and was about to head home. For a few weeks, my wife and I had lived in a small hut at the South Pole Station and driven daily to the U.S. West Coast aboard a small boat that was the only means of getting to and from South Pole Station. Most of the time, I was there alone, hauling supplies and cutting the power lines to the station. From the helicopter, we could easily see what was going on. One of the last trips of the season, a helicopter was dropping off a few members of the U.S. Geological Survey, the scientist in charge of the West Antarctic ice sheet project, and myself. It was January. There were no white-out conditions and the sun shone brightly on the snowy mountains around us. The helicopter landed in a rather flat area of the mountains, where it was easy to spot the tents of the station. I boarded the helicopter with the rest of the men, and soon had a good view of the mountains and the station and the boats anchored in the bay, too. When I arrived in the U.S., the phone rang. "Are you heading to the ice?" asked the voice on the other end. "No, I just returned from King George." "Well, the ice is just breaking up. You should be back before February." I knew that. It was only a week before the long, cold winter. But, I had to tell the caller that I was heading home. "So, how many times did you spend in King George?" "I don't know. I lost count somewhere between December and February." "That's a lot of time. That 2d92ce491b
