A model is presented that relates the benefits, in terms of survival time, to clinical decisions regarding diagnosis. The model allows for incorporation of disease prevalence and the costs of diagnostic and therapeutic procedures. A number of potential applications of the model are examined. These include the evaluation of new diagnostic technologies, the nature of the diagnostic "gold standard," and the clinical decision-making process itself. The model provides a basis for quantifying the utility of the different decision criteria and for comparing the effects of these criteria on the process of diagnosis.Unique-selling property in sought-after development!
