matrix characteristics and osteogenic potential of rat dental follicle cells.

Odontogenic tissues are derived from the cranial neural crest cells and are composed of a dental follicle and a dental papilla. Dental follicle cells have been used to study their functions in vitro. In this study, we investigated the extracellular matrix characteristics and osteogenic potential of dental follicle cells to gain further insight into the mechanism of tooth formation. Rat dental follicle cells were isolated and cultured. Collagen-related proteins were examined by Western blotting, and their release was measured by sandwich ELISA. The ability of dental follicle cells to form mineralized nodules in vitro was examined. Dental follicle cells released several kinds of collagen-related proteins, including type I collagen, type III collagen, and fibronectin.

Immunoreactivity of fibronectin and type I collagen increased with time in culture. The osteogenic potential of dental follicle cells was similar to that of bone marrow mesenchymal cells. Dental follicle cells were able to differentiate into mineralized nodules and express various types of
