I'm studying some NodeJS and I'm having trouble to understand how the Object.create function is working. Let's see the code. // Initializing an object var obj = { foo: 'hello', bar: 5 } // Generates the same object var obj_ = Object.create(obj) obj_.foo = 'world' If I type obj_ in the console. my output is the same as original one, but if I type obj I get the following result: { foo: 'hello', bar: 5 } How does the Object.create function generate a new object? A: Object.create() does not generate a new object. That is not what it does. It just creates a new (empty, unused) object which has the same properties and behavior as the object it's called on. In your code, you are assigning obj_ with a reference to the same object obj. Whenever you do obj_.foo you're actually setting the foo property of the same object. A: The object that you call the new operator on is normally passed as the first parameter. So the object that you create with Object.create is called on is not an independent object, but is passed as the first argument. The function adds the new object properties to the object that has been passed, except for the function properties which are added to the function itself. It's exactly the same thing you do when you set a new property on an object. If you do obj.foo = 123; you add a new property foo to the obj object and the property is added to both the obj and obj_. If you do obj.foo;, the property is added to obj and nothing happens to obj_.
