It doesn't take a lot of time before you check out the set of features, with the setup process being short and uneventful. You can opt to launch the application right away, and it minimizes to the tray area until you decide to use it. There's also an associated tray menu with quick access to predefined settings. The system clock is not modified by default. Doing so brings you to the configuration panel where you find an organized tree list of all world regions. Other details are displayed so you don't get stuck along the way. Additionally, the application can automatically correct the PC clock, or show a tray icon when changes are made. Synchronize time based on a custom server Unfortunately, selecting a region doesn't show any specific details, such as exact time zone, or the time in the selected region. The only thing you can do is synchronize to find out. Note that there's no quick option to reset time values to default, so the switch needs to be manually done through appropriate region selection. The application uses a preset list of online servers to grab time data. Selection reveal the source server for the selected region, and can easily be changed. In fact, you're not forced to use an item from the list, so you can simply synchronize time according to a server of your choice by simply punching in the corresponding address. Whether we need to do it because we're about to reformat our system or in case of an offline disaster, it becomes a necessary action. The good thing about synchronization is that it can save time as well. This is because, instead of having to look for files that are the same or compatible versions on each system you want to synchronize, you can just update all of them from the source. However, the bad thing is that there's no single file synchronization application
