Q: PHP extension not found in Ubuntu but ok in CentOS I'm looking at this error and it's not really indicating a problem in the software itself. The software is a PHP application, which uses a custom PHP extension I wrote in C and compiled with CMake. A Linux user reported that when he ran the application on CentOS 7, it would not work unless he installed the PHP extension via yum install php-md5. The software builds correctly and everything. just would not run without installing the extension. I do not use yum and try to keep all my packages up to date, so when I went into my distribution repositories to check, it said that no new versions of the package were available. I decided to look at the source code to see if there was a way to force it to see that it needed to install
