The brain tissue of the blowfly, Calliphora erythrocephala L., displays specific features that distinguish it from other insects in its structural organization. The brain is divided into a fused anterior ganglion (AG) and a separate posterior ganglion. These structures are encased in a sheath of connective tissue and show axonal trajectories whose direction is predominantly from the posterior ganglion to the anterior ganglion. The ultrastructural morphology of the brain tissue has been studied in detail. More than 1500 electron-dense particles were found in the neuropil of the brain, many of which were stained with various histochemical stains. However, all stainings had to be omitted before the actual fine structure of the particles could be identified. In the present work, there are two types of particles that are morphologically different from each other. Both particles are shown to be intramembranous particles, not endoplasmic reticulum (ER). The particles are associated with mitochondria (MM) and occur in the plasma membrane (PM) of dendrites in the neuropil. The PM particles are considered to represent ER-derived intramembranous particles. The mitochondrial particles can be distinguished from endoplasmic reticulum and ribosomes by their size and density and their lack of a connecting matrix. Furthermore, the PM particles differ from the mitochondrial particles by their location, shape, size, and number.The man arrested in a shooting Tuesday that sent one person to the hospital has been charged with attempted murder, according to the Salt Lake County District Attorney's Office.
