A global picture of these responses will be provided by characterizing (i) the gene regulatory networks that control various cellular processes, (ii) how the overall activities of these networks can be coordinated, and (iii) the components of the regulatory machinery that link the activity of individual network components to the control of cell growth and developmental processes. Recently, we made a substantial progress toward these goals by (i) constructing a computer model of the regulatory network governing E. coli growth and (ii) identifying and characterizing the promoter regulatory region (PRR) elements that control the transcription of these genes. A major future goal of this proposal is to analyze the structure and the function of the regulatory system that governs the growth of Bacillus subtilis. First, we will determine the structure of the Bacillus PRR by analyzing the nucleotide sequence of several Bacillus PR
