Antimicrobial activity-directed screening of a marine microorganism, strain N8a7, isolated from the sediment of the Sagami Bay, Japan, yielded the production of lipopeptides of the surfactin family. This was confirmed by positive thin-layer chromatographic patterns and high-resolution mass spectrometry. The lipopeptide compounds were found to be stable at 25 degrees C for over 2 months. The crude lipopeptide extract was fractionated by high-speed counter-current chromatography into four main components. The biological activity of the individual fractions was determined against four bacteria and two yeast species. The crude extract and fraction D were most active against all of the test organisms, and fraction B exhibited a weak inhibitory effect. Antimicrobial activity-directed chromatography and high-resolution mass spectrometry of fraction D further identified the antimicrobial compounds to be hexa-N-dodecyl-lysinyll-homoserine lactone and hexa-N-decanoyl-homoserine lactone. These compounds are closely related to the reported surfactin lipopeptides.(ns vleyk (:require [vleyk.util :refer [log]] [vleyk.client.cached :as cache]
