I'm reading the first coordinate, then I write the same coordinate, and then read the next coordinate. When I read the first coordinate, it returns 6144.5575839705855, which makes sense, since the coordinates should be in metres, not centimetres. But when I write the first coordinate, and then read the next one, it returns 20.480974782722619. This is the exact same value, but in decimal places. Why does this happen? A: This is the nature of floats. The first coordinate was actually in metres, but as it was sent over the network, and then back again, it lost the decimal places. So the first coordinate was actually

4.8471438325004844 meters, and the second coordinate was actually 20.480974782722619 meters. When you write the coordinates to the file, it actually writes it in decimal points, and then some rounding errors are introduced (I'm guessing).  $m - 4*m + k$ .
