I recently played a D&D 5e game. One of the players had his gaze knocked out of alignment by a spell. (He is a demon) This occurred at the end of the game when he was about to cast a spell. At that moment one of the party members, who was the cleric, heard a sinister voice speaking to him (His cleric power is a silver tongue so he couldn't just ignore it - it sounded really threatening). His cleric power also allows him to cast Speak with plants. The player had some kind of plant that he was using for blocking or reflecting the spell. At the same time, the DM was explaining the situation: that the player was trying to block the spell with the plant, that he still had the plant in his hand, that he could use his bonus action to do it etc. The whole time, the player was not only aware of his own actions but also aware of the events that were happening. He described in detail what was happening. He was able to change his mind about what to do, or make some decisions
