Sheep grazing in a sewage-polluted area are prone to the development of chronic cough and chronic pulmonary emphysema. In this study, to clarify the prevalence of the alveolar lesions in sheep, we investigated the features of hypersensitivity pneumonitis caused by hay fever pollen in ten sheep from a polluted area, including three types of alveolar lesions. Chronic congestion with erythrocyte congestion and interstitial fibrosis (12 animals) were found in the sheep with both acute and chronic symptoms of cough. Furthermore, we found irregular alveolar spaces with hypertrophy of the alveolar epithelium lining the airways (four animals), an enlargement of the blood vessel (one animal), and a large amount of fibrosis within the alveolar wall (six animals). Although lung macrophages were not observed in the lesions, in vitro
