In the prior art, multi-channel sound field synthesis systems have been employed for realizing a multi-channel stereophonic or multichannel surround sound system for stereophonic or multichannel sound sources or in a large-screen television system. One example of a prior art multi-channel sound field synthesis system is disclosed in Japanese Laid-Open Patent Publication No. 4-234523, which is incorporated herein by reference. The prior art multi-channel sound field synthesis system comprises a delay line network, a plurality of phase shifters, and a plurality of adders. The delay line network includes a plurality of delay lines, each of which is provided with the time axis correction amount. The phase shifters are used to adjust the time axis of the outputs of the delay lines, and adders are used to add the outputs of the phase shifters to the output signals of the delay lines. This system further comprises a processor for executing calculation based on the transfer function of the time axis of the delay line and the time axis correction amount, thereby to generate the respective time axis-corrected delay lines. The time axis correction amount can be obtained in advance by way of computer simulation, or can be obtained in advance by way of measurements of an object such as an actual ear. The prior art multi-channel sound field synthesis system is configured so that the respective sound source information is provided by use of the time axis-corrected delay lines. However, in the prior art multi-channel sound field synthesis system, the time axis-corrected delay line is a comb filter. Therefore, it has been difficult to achieve high-precision signal processing since the time axis-corrected delay line is capable of only performing simple delay processing. Further, in the prior art multi-channel sound field synthesis system, the time axis-corrected delay lines must be provided separately for the respective channels, so that it is difficult to provide a multi-channel sound field
