It is known to maintain a constant pressure within a bottle to maintain the freshness or spoilage of a product. This pressure may be applied to a liquid or a food product. In a bottle for storing a food product such as milk, cream or wine, the base of the bottle is provided with a drainage hole which is normally closed. Pressure is applied to the contents of the bottle to maintain the freshness of the product. If the base of the bottle becomes out of balance in height, the base tends to tilt and unbalance the bottle, causing a wobbling motion which is unsightly.

This also promotes uneven discharge of the contents of the bottle. It is also known to provide bottle bases of varying heights. It is desirable to have bases of different heights to accommodate different bottles sizes. This adds to the cost of the bottle and may lead to instability of the base.

It is an object of the present invention to provide a bottle base which can be readily, economically and accurately constructed. A major strength of this proposal is the development of a new fluorescent protein-based biosensor for the detection of PTK activity, a kinase that is known to play a critical role in promoting the metastasis of a number of forms of cancer.

Targeted inhibition of PTKs has been a major focus in cancer chemotherapy, but the development of useful tools to study PTK activity has lagged behind. The ability to detect PTK activity will provide critical information about the kinetics of PTK activity, a first step in determining the ability of PTK inhibitors to block kinase activity. These tools will be used to characterize the role of protein tyrosine phosphorylation in the metastasis of colon cancer, a disease that is one of the leading causes of cancer-related mortality. The proposed project is composed of three specific aims. Aim 1 will build a library of EBFP-based fluorescent PTK biosensors. The biosensors will contain specific mutations in the kinase domain of multiple PTKs as a way to obtain a high signal-to-noise response. Biosensors will be expressed in mammalian cell lines where they will be used to study PTK signaling. Sensors will be used to monitor signaling in vivo after receptor crosslinking, to
