"The ball has an incredible personality in FIFA," said Andrew Zimnik, Creative Director for FIFA. "It has spin, float, swerve and everything else. And with our game-changing HyperMotion Technology we get to take football back to where it started; with some very unique, exhilarating and pure football." "We're thrilled to bring FIFA 22's HyperMotion Technology to life," said EA SPORTS FIFA Lead Game Producer Jesse Rapczak. "We've designed the game to be hyperactive and full of spectacular moves, and the massive data samples we've collected from real-life footballers come together to bring these moves to life." The world-class data set also includes over two million data points covering 66 specific actions. The goal for the new feature is to deliver a game that plays closer to the way football should be played, while at the same time fully reproducing the most realistic look, feel, movement and gameplay possible. The ball movement is at the core of the game and looks natural, even when the player is sprinting or moving laterally. Even the most basic of controls feel effortless. The weather has been reworked to make the experience even better than before and this combined with the new game engine makes FIFA 22 one of the best-looking football games in recent memory. Particularly, the new motion capture technology is a game changer. "From the moment we put the players into the equipment we knew we had a chance to improve the gameplay and the fluidity of the game play," said Assassin's Creed Origins Game Director Patrice Desilets. "FIFA is one of the leaders in sports games and we've taken that knowledge and incorporated it into Assassin's Creed Origins. It allows us to make Assassin's Creed game play the very best it can be." The attacking side of the game - the shots, crosses, and flicks - feel incredibly responsive and offer an unrivaled level of sharp, pinpoint accuracy. Players
