1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a semiconductor memory device, and more particularly, to a semiconductor memory device in which a plurality of dynamic random access memory (DRAM) cells are connected in series.

2. Description of the Related Art Recently, with the widespread use of portable information devices, there is a growing demand for high-capacity nonvolatile memory devices. One of such high-capacity nonvolatile memory devices is a flash memory. However, flash memories have a drawback of requiring a long time to write and erase data. Hence, there has been an effort to develop a high-capacity nonvolatile memory device using a DRAM, which is a high-speed semiconductor memory device. As a method of implementing a high-capacity nonvolatile memory device using a DRAM, a semiconductor memory device has been developed, in which a plurality of DRAM cells are connected in series in the column direction (see, e.g., U.S. Pat. No. 6,304,142). In this semiconductor memory device, a column decoder and an address decoder are shared by the respective DRAM cells in each column, and only one column decoder is necessary for the entire semiconductor memory device. In addition, the semiconductor memory device includes an address buffer, which is shared by all the DRAM cells in each column, and a pair of data bus lines and a pair of word lines for transferring data from and to the respective DRAM cells. However, in such a configuration, if a voltage applied to a gate insulating film is reduced during a program of a DRAM cell, a gate insulating film of a neighboring DRAM cell which is programmed next is degraded. If such a degradation of the gate insulating film is accumulated, there occurs a problem in that the neighboring DRAM cell is erroneously accessed.
