Short-lasting depression of hearing function occurs during non-evoked seizures. Hearing loss is often observed during status epilepticus (SE). Based on animal models, the auditory brainstem response (ABR) has proven useful in demonstrating the existence of brainstem auditory pathways abnormalities in a variety of pathological conditions. To determine whether hearing impairment is a feature of epilepsy which can be caused by seizures, we recorded ABRs in six epileptic patients during non-evoked seizures. Seizure discharges were recorded by either subdermal or intracerebral electrodes and were never preceded by epileptic discharges in the auditory brainstem. In all patients, tinnitus or aural pain occurred during non-evoked SE. The first and second peaks of the ABR were significantly reduced in amplitude and time-constant when compared with a healthy control group ($p=0.01$ and p Folstein's Mini Mental State Examination as an indicator of vitamin B6 status and cognitive impairment among older adults. Folstein's Mini Mental State Examination (Folstein, Folstein, & McHugh, 1975) has been extensively used as an indicator of cognitive impairment, and there is increasing interest in its ability to also serve as an indicator of vitamin B6 status. To determine whether the Folstein score is an effective indicator of vitamin B6 status among older adults and to explore relationships between cognition and indicators of B6 status. Cross
